Excerpt from The Southern Planter and Farmer, Vol. 38: Devoted to Agriculture, Horticulture, and Rural Affairs; April, 1877 After the unfortunate termination of the Confederate struggle for the right of self-government, I surrendered myself to Gen. Patrick in the city of Richmond, and, as a paroled prisoner of war, left that city with my family early in June, 1865, for my little home of some 200 acres, where I now reside. Travelling in my private conveyance and with a considerable quantity of baggage, i had ample time to observe the desolations of war and to ponder over the melancholy duties of the hour. Reaching home, I found my farm without a rail or a tree to make one, literally a. Common, and with a 100 head of town stock daily grazing upon it. I recognized the rule of my State, which required the land-owner to fence in his. Farm, instead of requiring the stock-owner to fence in his stock, and so made no war upon them. But this state of things made it my duty to enclose with the utmost activity. Every thing had to be provided, labor hired timber bought, hauled and put in position. The consequent expenditure, being heavy, made it indispensable that the economy of force should always be considered. While so engaged, I found in my library a school book of my gallant son Austin, who, residing in California where he was rapidly accumulating a fortune, abandoned, at the call of his State, all his advantages, and on Whiting's staff in one of the earliest of the seven days battle around Richmond, marked his devotion to our dear old Mother and Duty, with his life. This...
